Chinese Highlands

In order to save time on the school road, which normally takes four hours, the kids of one of the remote villages have to use the blood-freezing mountain route.

They climb and descend the steep cliff at the expense of ladders, simultaneously dragging their satchels.

The danger is added by the fact that even five-year-old crumbs have to use this way, and during the rain, slippery crossbars do not add safety.

And although the locals have been discussing the city administration for years with a request to pave the road, no one agrees to sponsor a million-dollar project for the sake of a small settlement.
