What is synthetic phonics?

Phonics-based reading involves learning to recognize the distinct sounds, or phonemes, that go together to make up words. There are just over 40 phonemes in the English language. Some phonemes correspond to a single letter, like the f-o-x sounds in the word "fox", and others to combinations of letters, such as the sh-ar-k sounds in the word "shark".

Synthetic phonics is the process of reading by sounding the individual phonemes in a word, and then synthesizing – running them together – or blending them to read the whole word. Children who learn to read using synthetic phonics start by learning the individual phonemes, then soon learn to sound and blend in order to read whole words. This gives them the confidence to read unfamiliar words and tackle new texts, an important step towards independent reading.

Words can be divided into two basic groups: regular phonic words, such as "fox", which can be read by sounding and blending, and words which are wholly or partly irregular. Most words in English are regular, but some very common words, such as "the" and "was", are irregular and have to be learned. When your child meets an unfamiliar word, encourage him or her to read it regularly; children may recognize the irregularity and correct themselves, or you can guide them if necessary.

Read this story with your child, encouraging him or her to sound out the words as you go. Soon, most children will start to sound out the words for themselves. This is an excellent way of helping to develop a fundamental reading skill.

Hungry Fox spots
a box.

Hungry Fox
hops onto the box.

He tries to reach...

...a peach!

SPLAT!

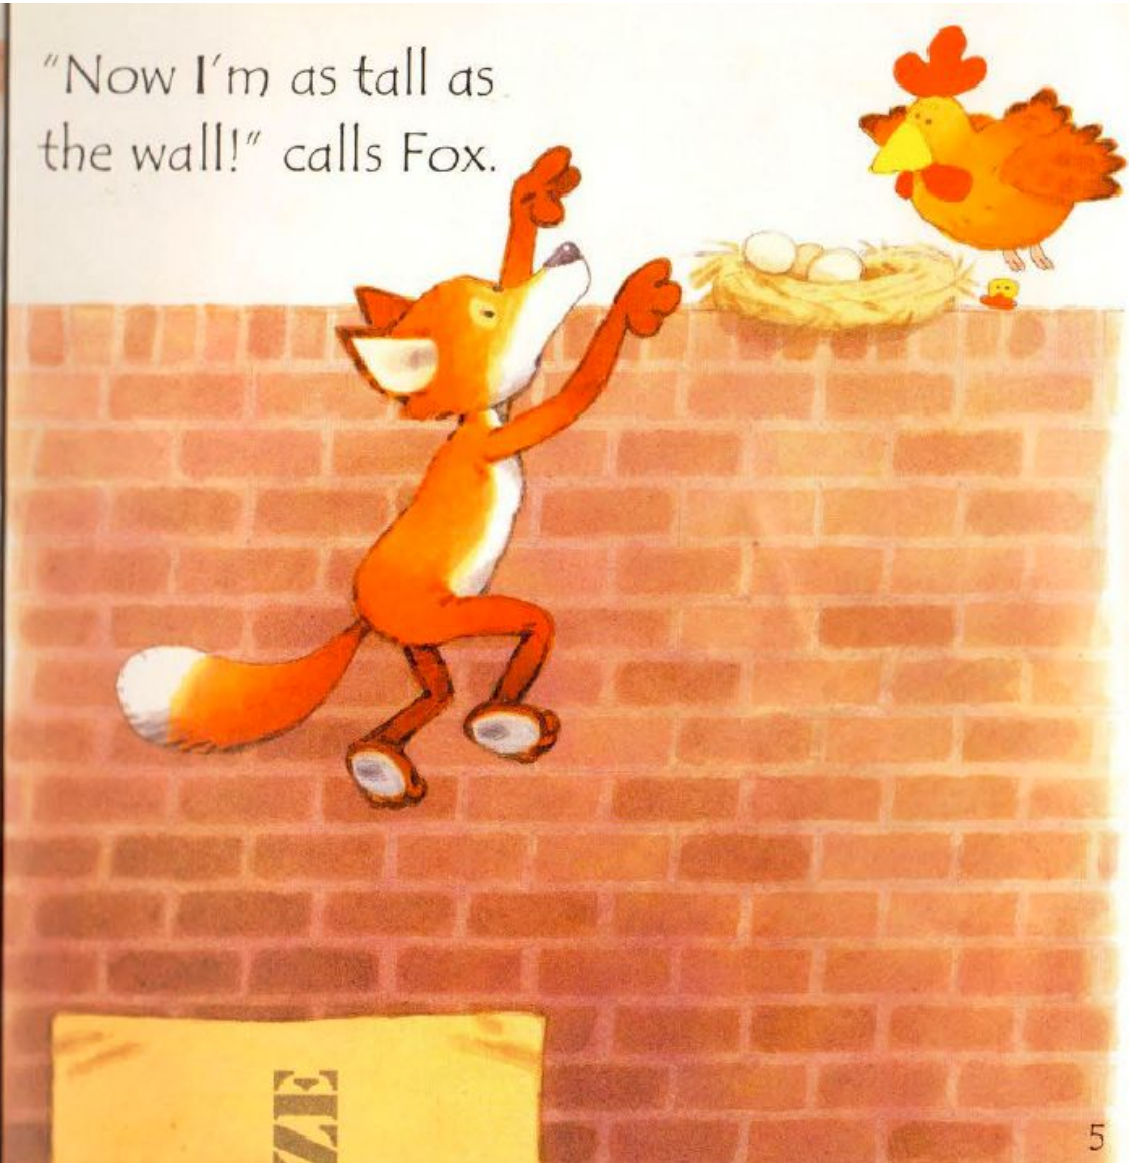

PRIZE

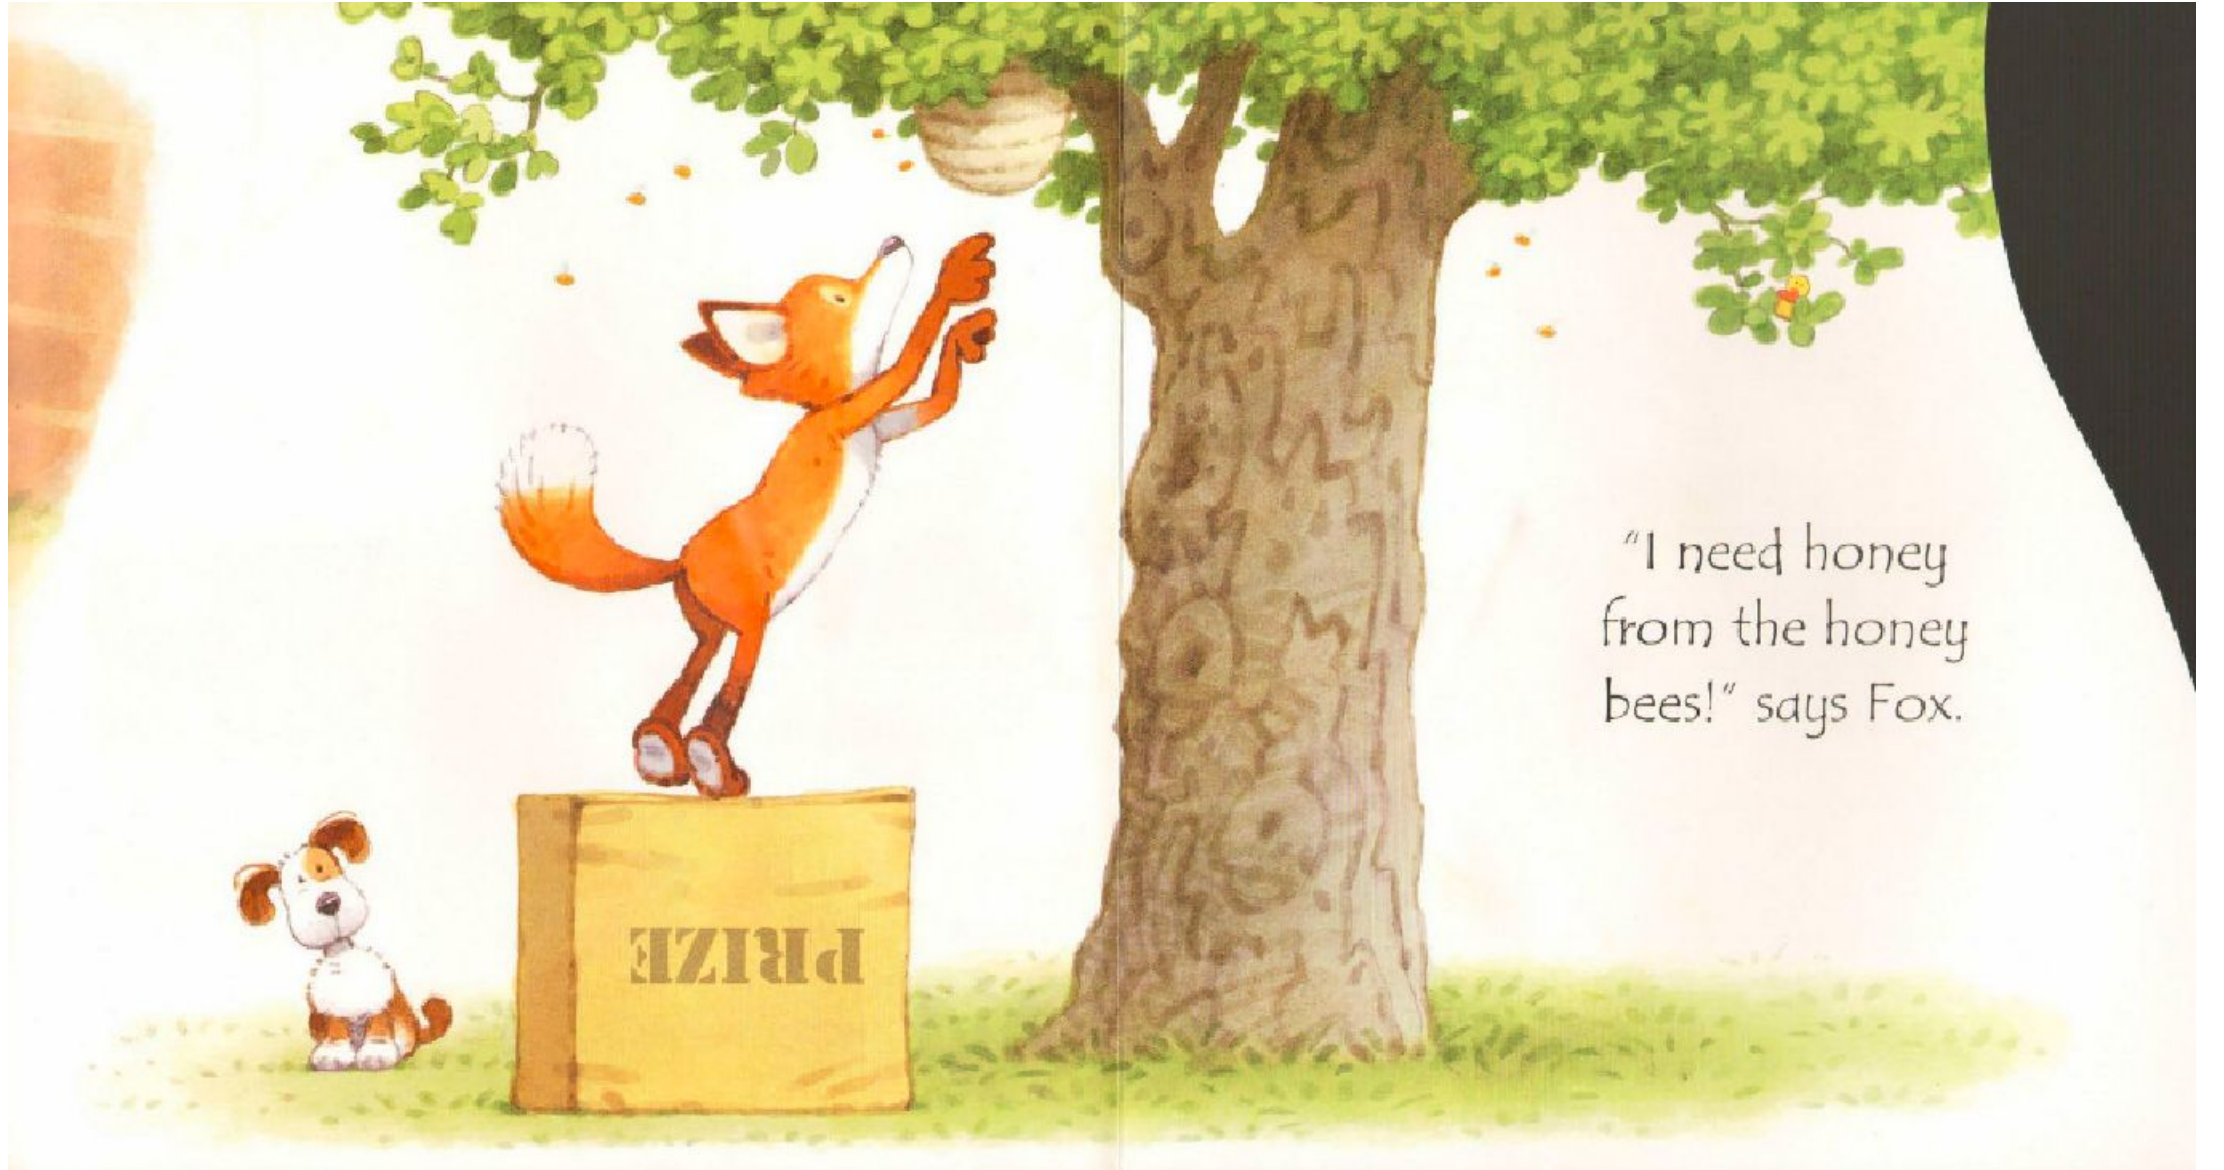

Hungry Fox pushes the box.

"Now I'm as tall as the wall!" calls Fox.

Hungry Fox
pushes the box.

"I need honey
from the honey
bees!" says Fox.

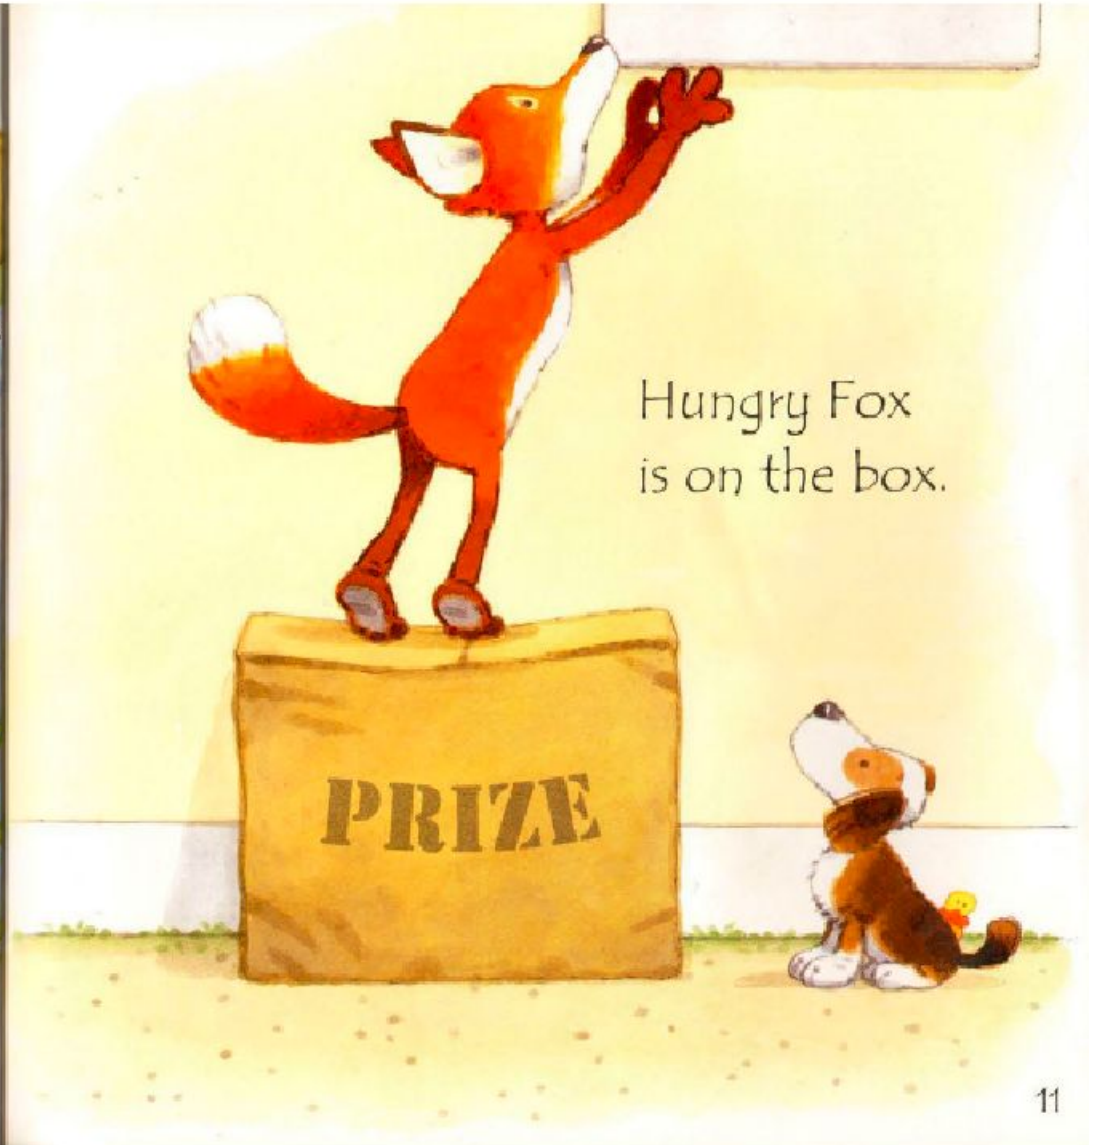

"I want fishes,"
wishes Fox.

But a tug from Duck
means he's out
of luck.

Hungry Fox
is on the box.

"I can reach
the cooling pies!" cries
Fox.

But Pup and Fat Cat ...

...put a stop to that.

Hungry Fox falls
into the box.

He heaves
himself out...

...to find
cream on his snout.

"I'm back in the box!"

shouts Happy Fox.
