Rusal free-float shareholder base

- 40% of the offer was allocated to cornerstone investors, which prompted some parties to question whether the deal was an IPO
- The offer was effectively closed to Chinese retail investors
- Rusal's post IPO price was 21% down over the first three months and 40% down by June 2010
- Its free-float adjusted average daily liquidity (defined as value traded) is 19% lower than the daily liquidity average for top 20 Russian companies on LSE

IRC free-float shareholder base

- Priced at 20% below the price range of HK$2.20-3.00
- IRC reduced the number of shares offered due to subdued investor demand
- Despite having very strong links with China, domestic tranche of the offering was only 24% filled
- Company's post IPO performance was poor: the price was 27% down over the first three months and is still below the offer price

○ Evidence suggests that going to HKSE does not necessarily attract Asian Investors:

- Rusal and IRC's investor base is still largely dominated by the UK, Cont. Europe and the US emerging markets funds
- Strong links with China do not guarantee demand from Asian investors
- Several HKSE IPOs have been recently pulled during the premarketing stage due to lack of Asian demand and listing location has been reconsidered

○ London has an unmatched depth of the UK, US and Continental Europe investor demand
