Excitement rockets after otherworldly sighting

HALO EFFECT: This image was caused by a space rocket that performed tests after it had released its satellite.

SHAUN SMILLIE

IT CAME from outer space, a strange object blazing across the Joburg sky that is what it seemed - a UFO - and with it on Sunday night came a flood of calls to observatories and Talk Radio 702.

Witnesses reported seeing a bright pulsating light with a halo and a second object that followed it.

But by yesterday, astronomers knew it had been caused by a US space rocket performing tests after it had released its satellite payload.

The object was seen over South Africa on Sunday.

"Calls just began flooding in," said Melony Spark, a student astronomer in the Western Cape.

Claire Flanagan, of the Johannesburg Planetarium, said: "One man said he was jacking-hunting and had watched the object through the scope of his rifle."

Flanagan received numerous calls not only from Joburg, but from Klerksdorp, Rustenburg and the Free State too.

Spark was able to track the object's flight path. Soon it was spotted in Italy. "It took half an hour to log it across Africa," she said.

On Sunday evening, a rocket carrying a US military weather satellite blasted off from Vandenberg Air Force Base in California.

The objects that witnesses saw are believed to have been the rocket and a satellite. Once the rocket was over Europe, it dumped fuel and left Earth's orbit around Greenland.

Europeans also noticed the object and posted footage on the internet.
