The basic job of a manager is often described as performing the functions of: Planning, Organizing, Leading and Controlling.

A good manager could be defined as someone who have the skills of effective delegation, be able to carry out long-term plans, be effective at planning and decision-making, be a facilitator not dictator, believe strongly in team work, encourages others to participate in decisions and plans, teach others how to solve problems without solving the problems for them.

In this modern age and time, even with the years that passed since women were given equal rights as men especially in democratic countries, attitudes toward women as managers remain relatively the same: there are still few women who hold executive positions worldwide.

And who is that good manager? Female or male?

Statistics:

According to an article on women in management, the number of women in top management positions has increased by nearly 60 % in the past decade but those who hold executive positions is still quite small at about 4.8 percent.

Other female leadership strengths:

- Women are better than men at empowering teams and staff.
 - Women encourage openness and are more accessible.
 - Women leaders respond more quickly to calls for assistance.
 - Women are more tolerant of differences, so they're more skilled at managing diversity.
 - Women identify problems more quickly and more accurately.
 - Women are better at defining job expectations and providing valuable feedback.

Conclusion:

- In conclusion, certain types of women, whose numbers have steadily increased through the years; do make better managers than men. These are women who have decided for themselves to succeed as managers and leaders just as much as certain men who have decided to do the same. It would be equally unjust or unfair and discriminating to make sweeping generalizations that at present, all women managers are now better than men.
