Tea is everywhere in England...

Great Britain - Tea With Milk

- The British are among the world's most massive tea consumers. Perhaps it is possible to understand the importance of tea in British culture if we recall Sir Winston Churchill's declaration during the Second World War that: "Tea is more important to the soldiers than munitions".
- Black tea was very common in Britain during the 18th century and the British founded the tradition of adding milk to black tea.

There is a joke in England :
" It's easier to imagine Britain without Queen than without tea!"

“I tried a cup of tea, a China drink, of which I never drank before”.
(Samuel Pepys)

In 1610 a Dutch ship brought a small box of tea from China to Holland. 40 years later in 1650 tea arrived in Britain.

Tea became very popular!

Do you know what sorts of tea are generally sought after among English people?

At 6 o'clock - "Assam"

At breakfast - "English Breakfast"

At noon - "English Tea #1"

At five o'clock – "English Afternoon"

In the afternoon – "Earl Grey" or "Darjeeling".

The choice of tea depends on its flavour!

It's time for tea... It means so much for every English family. The whole family around the table, cakes, pies, biscuits, sandwiches, cream and tea, all sorts of it – full of flavour and mystery. But to start with, they are lay the table for tea.

Making tea... It's a mysterious process, full of bright English traditions.

- 1. Fill the kettle with fresh water and boil it.
- 2. Warm the teapot.
- 3. Put in one teaspoon of tea for each person and one extra for the pot.
- 4. Pour hot water into the pot.
- 5. Let the tea infuse for five minutes, then stir and serve.

Enjoy your tea!

Tea is ready. And English ladies are in a hurry to present their cookies: pies, cakes, puddings and scones.
