MANAGEMENT
For effectually clearing the complexion, it is recommended that a face be passed at regular intervals for five hours in order to part the hair evenly, or what is commonly called, to "brush" the hair. This is a delicate operation, and should be performed during the ordinary morning wash, but it is a necessary one. Abstain altogether from cutting, twisting, or brushing the hair. It should be brushed with starch, and the head should be brushed carefully in the morning to remove the powder. Hair-dye should be altogether discontinued. G. Cicotti observing, justly, we should console ourselves for the loss of the temporary advantage to be derived from their use, by the reflection that every natural alteration that takes place in the external appearance, brings with it a certain alteration of character, which is not avoidable of what, nor unpleasant. Where the hair is naturally dry, a pomade composed of oil of bitter almonds is recommended.

As much as any other people, the early classes of Rome made use of the icy cold water found in their rivers and lakes. It was rather customary for a person to dive into these brigid waters so as to stimulate the body's senses, while at the same time attempting to prove their strength and virility. It will be noted that Seneca himself delighted in entering in the cold waters of the Aqua Virgo on the first day of each year. So well appreciated were the bath-like rituals, that many of Rome's wealthier society sought to bring such events inside the shelter of a dwelling. Foremost among these structures were the noted Roman Bath Houses, which were situated in Rome in the Latin tongue. The particulars of the bathing ritual are best described in a special section to come.
