Looking through the economic and financial lens

The world's largest enterprises, the Global 1000, have the economic power to exert enormous influence over their own sustainable future as well as that of others. They have the power to convene NGOs, business associations, government leaders, policy think tanks, and professional and trade associations for horizontal collaboration to address global issues. And recently, with the support of such alliances and organizations as the UN Global Compact, the World Resources Institute, the Clinton Foundation, and many others, they have begun to make major strides in expanding their influence and their role for the mutual benefit of all. Two issues stand out in stark relief as we look at sustainable globalization through an economic and financial lens. First we see the need to look at economic globalization through an environmental, social, and governmental lens. Second, we see the need to fundamentally redefine what we mean by economic globalization.
