Jack London

Jack London was an American novelist, short-story writer, essayist, journalist, and dramatist.

He was born in San Francisco in 1876. His father abandoned him shortly after birth and London took the name of his stepfather. Because of his family's poor condition, London was forced to leave school at the age of fourteen and find work. In his spare time he attempted to further his education by reading the works of Herbert Spencer, Karl Marx, Rudyard Kipling, and others. He joined the Klondike gold rush of 1898 returning to San Francisco penniless, but with a wealth of memories which provided the raw material for his first stories. "The Call of the Wild" and "White Fang" explore the struggle between the conflicting calls of barbarity and civilization.

Jack London

As a correspondent for various magazines, London travelled to the Far East during the Russo-Japanese war, through the South Pacific in a leaking ketch, and to the slums of England. These experiences provided the material for many of his books. London became the highest-paid writer of his day, earning more than a million dollars. He was an extremely disciplined craftsman and each day he wrote at least one thousand words. The paradoxes of London's fiction mirrored the contradictions of his personal and political life.

He died in 1916. London is an important figure in American literature for establishing “a middle ground”, in Labor's words, “between the gutter and the drawing room”.
