The idea that chatting in the Internet can replace real-life communication is becoming more and more popular with each year. Social networks such as Facebook and Twitter take over our lives at a meteoric speed and nobody really objects to them. However, I do think that chatting in the Internet is a sheer waste of time.

First of all, this means of communication deprives us of a possibility to really interact with a person we are speaking to owing to the fact that emotions can be easily hidden under words and smileys. Moreover, not only do we fail to understand somebody completely, but we also forget all the necessary skills of speaking in public. It can often lead to us being shy and withdrawn when we have to talk with somebody.

However, opponents argue that sharing information via the Internet is both faster and more convenient as you can find out everything you want without even lifting a finger. They consider it to be vital and inevitable in our fast-moving world.

Despite this widespread belief, I adhere to my own standpoint. There're other means of communication including speaking by phone, for instance, that can turn out as effective as social networks. Furthermore, they will provide you with intellectual enrichment. Seldom can you derive it from chatting in the Internet.

To put it in a nutshell, I reckon that it's high time people understood that social networks take control of their personalities and embraced real-life communication instead of it. Albeit socialising in the real world seems old-fashioned, it is in fact much more beneficial than Internet communication.
