

Reporter: Good evening, Mr Sanders! I'm from The Sun. Can you tell what happened to you when you were driving home last week?

Mr Sanders: Well ... It all happened at about six thirty in the evening when I was returning home from work as usual ...

Reporter: Go on ...

Mr Sanders: All of a sudden something flew down right from the sky and hit the roof of my car. I was surprised!

Reporter: Wow! What was it?

Mr Sanders: You won't believe. It was a cat. A big grey cat!

Reporter: Oh, my God!

Mr Sanders: I stopped the car and got out. The cat was sitting on the ground looking at me. Then two people appeared. They looked very worried.

Reporter: Who were the people?

Mr Sanders: The cat's owners. It turned out that the woman had left the balcony door of their eighth floor apartment open. Everybody knows that cats are curious animals. So it was walking on the balcony parapet when it fell off onto my car.

Reporter: Oh, dear! That's terrible. How was the cat ... and your car?

Mr Sanders: That's unbelievable but after such a dangerous fall the cat was fine! As for my car it was damaged, there is a noticeable scratch.

Reporter: How do you feel know, Mr Sanders?

Mr Sanders: You know, I'm still a bit shocked as I couldn't understand what it was at the first moment.

Reporter: It's not surprising! What a story! Thank you for sharing it with us.

Electric cars have not been popular among Russian drivers because of extreme climate, high price, and limited distance on a single charge.

However, this summer a Russian company has presented its prototype for a new model of electric cars. There are many people in Russia who believe that Russia needs electric cars. They say that it's hard to breathe in Moscow, and an electric car is environmentally friendly. For large cities it's a way to solve environmental problems.
