

In tribes it was initially only the men who painted themselves. This was because they believed that evil demons could harm them when they were hunting. They therefore painted their faces to hide themselves from the evil spirits. Women, who had no place in the hunt and lived in the villages, had no need to paint their faces.

In contrast, women in medieval times in Europe wanted to make their skin a great deal whiter. They used flour powder to achieve this aim. Later, French women painted their faces white and made their lips and cheeks brighter by using the colour red.

Make-up was widely used to cover the scars caused by smallpox. Men often covered their faces with red paint and wore wigs to be fashionable. It was only after the French Revolution that men felt that their natural look was more fashionable. Women stopped doing these things during the reign of Queen Victoria.
